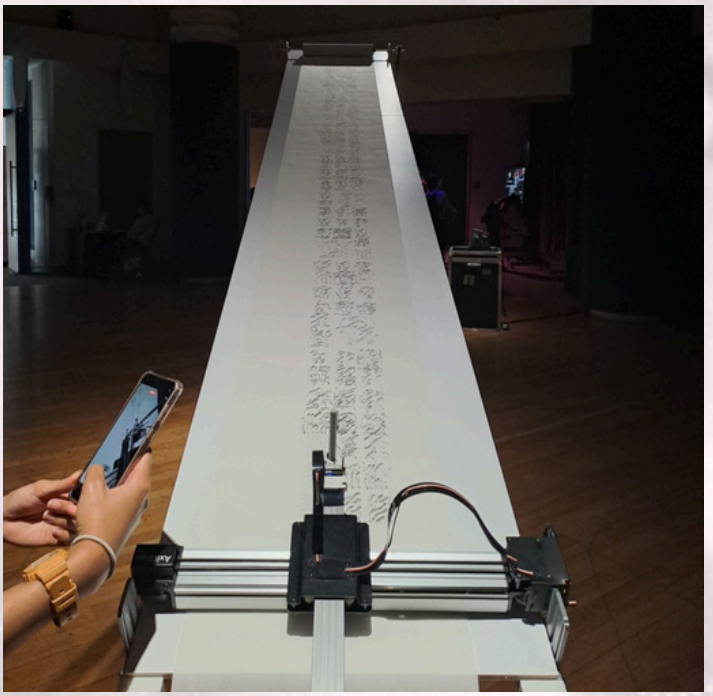
Ground Loops reflection

Puan Yi Hui

I found this exhibition very insightful as it allowed me to explore more about how art, coding, and interaction can come together in unexpected ways.



Among all the works displayed, the drawing machine stood out to me the most.

I found it very cool that a continuous abstract pattern could be created using only dots. Standing there observing these dots slowly come together to form cloud-like patterns on a long paper was a new experience for me.

Another work I liked was the one similar to the dance revolution game.

I really enjoyed the interactive aspect where I was able to select my own words and have them printed out as a personalised "poem" on a small slip of paper. While experimenting with different word choices, I noticed that the background of the printed slip would turn darker when more words were added. This discovery was something very interesting and it made me think about how audiences' input/ interactions can visually influence an artwork. This also made the artwork feel more unique as no other person would get the exact same slip of paper as me.
